There is little doubt in my mind that Lawrence Cunningham has captured the ‘monastic vision’ of Thomas Merton. That of course is the only real vision Merton ever sought. This book is as close to an insider’s view of Thomas Merton as I have read. While it covers material familiar to all devotees of Merton, the perspective is unique. It is precisely because of this unique perspective that I highly recommend the book to all who are seeking a deeper insight into Thomas Merton the monk.

Eugene Hensell, OSB

Thomas Merton is recognized in the field of religious studies for his immense contributions to Buddhist–Christian dialogue, particularly on the subject of the meaning of awareness in the Zen tradition. For the first time since his death, there is an important book that contains Merton’s lectures, poems, notes, correspondences, and book reviews, all of which reveal his serious interests in Islam, and especially in the Sufi tradition. In this invaluable compendium of Merton’s works on Islam one can easily read the multifaceted and wide range of interests in Sufism, especially his discovery of Sufi spiritual love for the divine.

Merton and Sufism confirms again that Merton was a man consumed by the love for God and the love of seeking a deeper knowledge of God. The book begins with a preface and an introduction by two distinguished Sufi scholars of our time, Seyyed Hossein Nasr and William C. Chittick. Nasr’s preface speaks about Merton’s attraction to Sufism and how his knowledge of the Islamic mystical path was authentic and genuine and ‘thirsted for the kind of structured mystical life which the Sufi path offered’ (p. 11). The chapter by Chittick is a useful short introduction for readers who are unfamiliar with the roots of Sufism and its place within the Islamic tradition. It appears that Chittick was interested in outlining the main concepts of how Sufis view the unveiling process (kashf) of themselves to reach a stage of annihilation and subsistence to reunite with God. Here Chittick demonstrates the dichotomy between the dogmatic and philosophical Islamic scholars versus Sufis and the ways in which classical Sufis interpreted numerous passages of the Qur’an and the Prophet Muhammad’s sayings (hadiths) to support their mystical path. In one way, Chittick’s description of the early Sufis parallels Merton’s own encounter with Sufism.

The first three chapters are reflections of Merton’s interests in Sufism, Islam, and his dialogue on Islam with an Islamicist, Louis Massignon. Burton Thurston discussed Merton’s thought, which stemmed from his monastic life, on the essentialness of trials. Thurston described how for Merton, ‘You can’t live for God without trial...love and trials are inseparable’ (p. 35) reflects many Sufi themes of restraining and disciplining the soul (nafs) against basic human instincts. Clearly, there are overwhelming Sufi spiritual themes in Merton’s struggle to develop a ‘real’ piety before the Lord, which for him required one to resist the appetites of the soul. While the practice of resisting is not specifically spelled out in these chapters, one can assume that Merton’s knowledge of the classical Sufi shaikhs like al-Hallaj, al-Hujwiri, al-Junayd, Farid ud-din ‘Attar introduced him to what it entailed. In Bonnie Thurston’s chapter entitled ‘Thomas Merton’s Interest in Islam: The Example of Dhikr’ she illustrates how his practice of remembrance of God was central to his spirituality. While at times the chapter contains simplistic conclusions of Sufi theology and practices, or even of Merton’s understanding of the tradition, one can not ignore Merton’s deep desire to develop a spiritual core and a transcendent Sufi spirituality.

With regard to Merton’s correspondences with Louis Massignon, which amount to about 14 letters from 1959 to 1961, both individuals connect together and write about their common spiritual paths as well as their concerns on modernity, war, and the evils in society. From this chapter one is astonished by Massignon’s influence on Merton’s thought and increasing understanding of Islam. Sidney Griffith’s chapter on the Massignon-Merton relationship is essential to understanding Merton’s widening network of mutual friends, especially to those folks who practiced the Sufi way or were interested in similar questions of Sufi spirituality. In a convincing essay, Griffith shows how the Islamic faith poses several challenges in terms of knowing the ‘other’ In particular, encountering Islam’s focus on the God of Abraham forced these two figures to rethink the purity of the heart as Christians. Merton’s love for Massignon is reflected in his book Life and Holiness, which he dedicated to Louis Massignon, but I think it was Massignon’s passion for being committed to a martyred Sufi Shaikh’s life—al-Hallâj—that really opened Merton’s heart even further to the meaning of Sufi love.

Without a doubt the heart of the book lies in Chapter 7, ‘Merton’s Sufi Lectures to Cistercian Novices, 1966-68’, written by Bernadette Dieker. Dieker has transcribed Merton’s knowledge of Islam and Sufi lectures to his fellow monks at Gethsemani. Dieker accurately points out his profound wisdom of the tradition, which cannot be separated from his love of injecting humor into the lectures. Merton’s subjects to discuss with the Cistercian monks are precisely chosen so that his fellow monks can see the continuity and comparative themes in both traditions. Whether he is speaking on the subject of ‘knowledge of God’ or ‘God Manifest’ or ‘Searching for God’, this chapter vividly demonstrates Merton’s spiritual illumination by Sufi teachings. In his discussion on ‘The Names of God’ he stated that ‘He makes Himself known to us, is to receive into Oneself the breathing of God’s Mercy’ (p. 140). Merton is hitting upon one of the most important Sufi teachings, which is that God’s self-disclosure in this world is a tangible and obtainable goal. Later in the seventh chapter, Merton’s discussion ‘The Straight Way’ directly refers to the first chapter (sura) of the Qur’an, the fatihah. His exegesis of the fatihah mirrors that of many other Sufi scholars of the present and past, especially his concentration on the section of God’s mercy, where he states ‘God as Merciful or rahmit, is the basic mercy in which everything is grounded; God Himself as the ground of all being is Mercy itself’ (p. 141). I think any reader will realize by this point Merton’s authentic Sufi faith and genuine love for the direct experience that comes with divine harmony. In this section one is convinced that Merton had a unique ability to internalize some basic ideas of Sufi spirituality, while at the same time being able to speak about it in real terms. Even without the guidance of a Sufi shaikh or teacher, which is the usual method of learning and practicing the inner path, Merton’s lectures displays a type of love that is manifested from humility, sincere piety, dissolution of the self, all of which are directly from the Sufi tradition.

It is clear that Merton tried to read everything available on Sufism, and one particular work that stood out was Martin Ling’s book A Moslem Saint of the Twentieth Century. This focused on the sayings and teachings of the Algerian Sufi teacher Shaikh Ahmad al-’Alawi (1869–1939), who for Merton was a remarkable man of God. As a spiritual seeker, Merton made markings, underlined passages, and added marginal commentaries in his own copy. At one section he wrote down: ‘Where soe’er ye turn, there is the Face of God’, which is actually a verse from the Qur’an.

If there was a moment in Merton’s life that must have opened his eyes, ears, and heart to Sufi practice it must have been his encounter with the Moroccan Sufi teacher Sidi Abdeslam. Sidi Abdeslam visited the Abbey of Gethsemani in October of 1966 and in Rob Baker’s essay one vividly feels Merton’s absolute awe at his presence. With this visit Merton finally reached a Sufi unveiling, or at least a closer insight into the divine. He wrote in his journal the following:

‘Above all, importance of knowing and following the voice of one’s own heart, one’s own secret: God in us. Deepening contact with source. Through a friend etc. who understands. Certainly this visit had that effect. A deepening, a clearing of the wells’ (p. 245).

This book is an incredible contribution to the life and works of Merton, and a groundbreaking source both for those who think they know Merton and also for those who rejected his understanding of Islam’s contemplative Sufi tradition. Without any doubt this book responds to the skeptics and experts on Merton by encapsulating his extensive knowledge of the Sufi tradition. One of the many advantages of this book is that the reader can read Merton’s poems and book reviews that are related to Islam and to the Sufi tradition in the appendix section. Again, the reader will be amazed to find how Merton embodied the love and humility of the Sufis with little Sufi guidance, and also the way in which his poems echo the same inner desire for God as those of Imam Jalal ud-din Rumi of Ibn ‘Arabi. In Merton’s poem entitled ‘To Belong to Allah’, truly captures his spiritual core and inner path of enlightenment:

To belong to Allah
Is to see in your own existence
And in all that pertains to it
Something that is neither yours
Nor from yourself,
Something you have on loan;
To see your being in His Being,
Your subsistence in His Subsistence,
Your strength in His Strength;
Thus you will recognize in yourself
His title to possession of you
As Lord,
And your own title as servant:
Which is Nothingness (pp. 290-91).
