

SAINT ANNE'S, SOHO

by Paul M. Pearson

When I first moved to live in London in the summer of 1985, I decided to spend some time taking a look at some of the London “sights” connected with Thomas Merton. I began with finding the church where Merton’s parents, Owen Merton and Ruth Jenkins, were married on 7 April 1914. I was disappointed to find that all of the church, except for its tower, had been destroyed by enemy action on the night of 24 September 1940. The tower alone remained. It contained a parish office and small meeting room set in the quiet grounds of what had formerly been the church. Though I was disappointed not to see the church, the gardens were a haven of quiet amidst the busy streets of the Soho area of London’s famous West End. The other sites connected with Merton’s time in London — his preparatory school, the house in Ealing, the Bennett’s flat, and the Middlesex Hospital where Owen died in 1931 — were not of much interest.

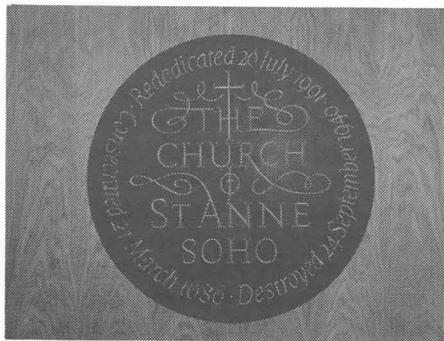

Last summer my interest in St. Anne’s, Soho, was once again stirred when an article in The Church Times, the Church of England’s weekly newspaper, told of the rebuilding of St. Anne’s around the tower and of its re-dedication on 26 July 1991 by the Bishop of Fulham, the Right Reverend John Klyberg. St. Anne’s was originally consecrated in 1688 and was attributed to Sir Christopher Wren, though its tower, the only part to survive the Second World War, was redesigned by S. P. Cockerell and rebuilt in 1803. The church has not been rebuilt to its former dimensions. Instead the site has been redeveloped around the tower to include a smaller church with various meeting rooms, an office and a kitchen, along with twenty flats for the Soho Housing Association, an exhibition room and some shopping space. The church is open at various times each day for daily prayers, a Eucharist, and quiet prayer. Since it was reopened I have visited it regularly and it provides a haven of peace and quiet in the heart of the busy West End.

Towards the end of 1930 and the beginning of 1931, Thomas Merton spent a great deal of time in the area of the West End, where St. Anne’s is situated, visiting bookshops, theatres, and cinemas. I doubt very much that Merton ever visited the church where his parents were married though at this time he was staying at the Bennett’s flat, while his father was dying in the Middlesex Hospital — both just a short walk from St. Anne’s. Like his faith, I expect, it lay at this stage undiscovered.
